By Scott Stewart Leader Managing Editor | Updated 4 months ago

An employee of Hillcrest Health Services will represent more than 11,000 long-term care providers nationally to make decisions about industry-wide clinical issues.

Anna Fisher, director of quality and education at the Bellevue-based health services company, was appointed to serve on the American Health Care Association's Clinical Practices Committee.

"I'm honored to be selected to serve on this committee," Fisher said in a press release.

"I am passionate about advocating for quality health care and programs for aging adults and those needing long term care services. I look forward to making a contribution to the AHCA's clinical practice goals."

Fisher, a certified dementia practitioner, oversees implementation of educational and quality improvement programs for Hillcrest Health Services. She serves as president of the Consortium of Dementia Alternatives, and she is a producer NET television's "Now What?" covering topics on eldercare and dementia.

The AHCA represents nonprofit and for-profit nursing facilities, assisted living care providers, developmentally-disabled care providers and subacute care providers serving about 1 million people daily.
